Reader’s Introduction

What this book is

This is not a novel, not a manifesto, and not a theory.
It’s written as a textbook — a fictional government document from the year 2035.
Officially, it’s meant for students. In reality — for anyone trapped inside a collapsing city under occupation and systemic failure.

It has no characters, no storyline, no resolution.
What it has is structure — and an attempt to keep the mind intact while everything else falls apart.

Why it was written

Because we now live in a world where collapse no longer feels impossible.
Because occupation may not begin with an army.
Because migration, violence, institutional decay, and fear are already here.
Because millions of people still hope “it won’t get that bad.”
And because no one teaches us what to do when it does.

Why it’s not fiction

Almost everything in this book is based on reality — personal, collective, or historical.
This is not a fantasy.
It’s a reconstruction of the possible.
It’s a psychological defense — a map drawn by people who have felt the tremors.

To survive, you may have to abandon the illusion that being peaceful means being safe.

What to do with it

Read it — if you’re ready.
Skip it — if you’re not.

Use it — if the world around you begins to fracture.
Share it — if you understand what it's really saying.

It was written to endure.
Even if we do not.
